

Happy Valentine's Day!

To My Darling

I know I may not say it often enough, but I love you. I don't know why it is so hard to say those three little words. Maybe because they don't express how I feel about you, my love, my best friend, my life partner. You have been my rock, my angel, and I would not be the person I am today had my life not been touched by you.

Through your love and support, you have helped me grow as an individual, and taught me what it means to be a partner. You have taught me when to bend, and when to stand firm. How to be patient for the greater good, yet still express my own needs. It is this duality, this allowing me to be who I am and also teaching me how to be part of a couple, that ever fascinates and amazes me. I am so grateful to have found you.

You have taught me that love is not in the superficial things, but rather in the meaningful. That love is not in the big moments, but the small. That love does not mean it isn't necessary to say you are sorry, but that love permits you to say you are sorry. That when the going gets tough, love imbues you with a courage you didn't know you had, and gives you the strength to accomplish things you could only have dreamed of doing before. You have shown me that in the darkest hour, you remain my light.

I know a great deal of hoopla attends Valentine's Day, but there are not enough flowers, chocolates, and diamonds in the world to adequately show you how deep my love for you runs, so I am sending this heartfelt letter in the hopes you know how much I love you. You are the very breath I take, and because of you, I am whole and complete, both as an individual and as a partner.

From this day forward I will strive--every day--to show you how much I love you, and how grateful I am that you are a part of my life, and a part of me.

With all my love,

